Creating connection: what consumers want from brands in a divided society
But despite the negativity, people remain hopeful. Hopeful that social media, for all its pageviews matter, but they say little about consumer sentiment or why someone stays forward. Learn more at sproutsocial.com

---

Table of contents

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Page</th>
<th>Section</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>2</td>
<td>Introduction</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3</td>
<td>Key findings</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5</td>
<td>Connection is the new currency</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9</td>
<td>Brands are the new relationship experts</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>14</td>
<td>Real people drive real connections</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17</td>
<td>Brands must listen before they speak</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>21</td>
<td>Bridging the gap: brands as community builders</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24</td>
<td>What’s next for brands on social</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>26</td>
<td>About the data</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
People today feel more divided than united—and it’s all too easy to see why.

Political discussions veer toward ‘right vs. wrong’ and ‘us vs. them.’ Sharing an opinion can quickly devolve into name-calling and fighting amongst friends who don’t see eye to eye. And online, this all happens at the speed of social.

New data from Sprout Social reveals that four out of five consumers believe society is more divided today than ever before. Asked what factors contribute to society’s fracturing, 72% point fingers at government and political leaders, and over half of consumers (55%) say social media is to blame.

But despite the negativity, people remain hopeful. Hopeful that social media, for all its flaws, can actually heal society’s divisions and reconnect people with one another. Ninety-one percent of consumers believe social can connect people, and 78% want brands to use social to bring them together. Unlike partisan public figures, brands find themselves uniquely positioned to foster connections between people online.

We surveyed more than 1,000 consumers to understand their desire for greater connection—with the brands they love and with each other—and how brands today benefit when they facilitate connection on social. This report explores why consumers see brands as ideal facilitators of connection and how brands can establish meaningful relationships with consumers by acting as connectors first and sellers second.
Key findings

Brands are no strangers to social. But, by and large, brands have only just begun to realize the value of truly connecting with consumers and treating social as more than a channel for promotion. Here are the top five findings from our research on the business value of building connections through social channels:

• People believe brands and social media can power connections. Despite feelings of division, 91% of people believe in social’s power to connect people. More specifically, 78% of consumers want brands to use social to help people connect with each other.

• Social is the number one channel for brands to connect with consumers. When asked which communication channels give brands the best opportunity to connect with their customers, survey respondents ranked social media as number one.

• Connection breeds loyalty and bottom line growth. Investing in relationships with consumers directly impacts business revenue and strengthens customer loyalty. When customers feel connected to brands, more than half of consumers (57%) will increase their spending with that brand and 76% will buy from them over a competitor.
• Real people are the key to authentic relationships. Consumers want to learn more about the people behind their favorite brands. Seventy percent of consumers, for example, report feeling more connected when a brand’s CEO is active on social. Additionally, 72% of consumers report feeling similarly when employees share information about a brand online.

• People want brands to connect them to other people. And they don’t mean only those with similar mindsets. Sixty-two percent believe social can unify people of different backgrounds and beliefs, and more than half (52%) expressed interest in connecting with individuals different from them.
Connection is the new currency

Our newsfeeds today overflow with constant breaking news stories and examples of leaders pitting one group against another. All the political strife can make it a challenge to find a true connection. But while 72% of consumers cite government and political leaders as playing a significant role in dividing society, people have a much more favorable outlook when it comes to brands.

Their expectations for brands are high. Consumers expect brands to serve as connectors, whether that means fostering connection with their own customers or bringing together people with different perspectives. In fact, nearly two thirds (64%) of consumers want brands to connect with them, while just under half (49%) expect brands to bring people together toward a common goal.

High expectations: what today’s consumers want from brands

- Be positive contributors to society: 72%
- Connect with their consumers: 64%
- Use their power to help people: 64%
- Bring people together toward a goal: 49%
- Raise the moral standard for others: 48%
- Unite people from different backgrounds: 46%
- Act as leaders in our society: 43%
But what defines a connection between a brand and consumers?

For starters, it’s not just about a brand’s popularity. Metrics like audience size and pageviews matter, but they say little about consumer sentiment or why someone stays loyal to a particular company. A growing number of followers, for example, doesn’t reveal why someone feels an attachment to a specific brand or if a shopper is truly loyal to one business over another.

When asked to reflect on their relationship with brands, two thirds of consumers equate feeling connected with trust. Furthermore, 53% of people say they feel connected when that brand’s values align with their own. And more than half (51%) say their relationship with a brand starts when they feel the brand understands them and their desires.

More than transactional: how consumers define feeling connected to a brand

- They trust the brand: 66%
- The brand aligns with their values: 53%
- The brand understands them and their wants: 51%
- They depend on that brand’s products or services: 50%
Of all the communication channels available to them, consumers point to social media as providing brands the greatest opportunity to truly connect with their audiences. Other effective channels for connection include TV/radio advertising, email and direct mail to consumers' homes. Social ads round out the top five.

Consumers rank which channels give brands the best opportunity to connect with customers

1. Social media
2. TV/radio ads
3. Email
4. Direct mail
5. Social ads
Social also gives brands the opportunity to connect people on opposite ends of the political spectrum. Seventy-two percent of consumers who identify as conservative want brands to use social to help individuals connect with each other; 85% of those who identify as liberal share the same desire.

Regardless of political affiliation, consumers want brands to use social media to help people connect with each other.

- 85% Liberal
- 80% Moderate
- 72% Conservative
Brands are the new relationship experts

As the demand for connection grows stronger, consumers see brands in a new light. The brands who focus on building genuine relationships among their consumers, rather than strictly selling to them, will differentiate themselves from the competition.

Our research reveals that nearly four in five consumers (79%) agree brands are well positioned to connect people of varying backgrounds and beliefs—and for several reasons. Eighty-one percent of consumers say brands can be good connectors because they carry products and services that appeal to a diverse range of customers. And 58% make the case for brands as unifiers because they receive significant media coverage and attention.

Why consumers believe brands are able to connect people of varying beliefs and backgrounds

- They appeal to a diverse range of people: 81%
- They have large platforms to reach people: 72%
- They receive substantial media coverage: 58%
- They have financial resources: 55%
- They have people's trust: 49%
So why do consumers rank social as the top channel for brands to use when connecting with their customers? It’s worth taking a broader look at how people view social and its impact on their lives. The majority of consumers believe social can bring people together, with 63% citing social’s ability to help people keep in touch, and 62% saying social unites people with different beliefs.

Based on personal experience, nearly half of consumers (46%) say social has introduced them to new people, while 44% say it has helped them understand a different point of view. As brands embrace their role as relationship builders, doubling down on social to power connections is the logical next step.
Consumers want brands to use social to help them connect with others for several reasons. More than half of consumers (55%) want brands to use social to help connect like-minded people with each other, while more than one third (36%) are looking for communities they can belong to. And over half of conservatives (51%) and liberals (54%) would like to connect with people who are different from them.

Why consumers want brands to use social media to help people connect with each other

- 55% Connect with likeminded people
- 52% Meet people different from them
- 42% Learn new skills
- 36% Build community
- 26% Not feel alone
But why should brands care?

Simply put, connection breeds loyalty, protecting businesses from boycotts when customers have a bad experience, or from losing customers to a competitor. Sixty-four percent of consumers say that their loyalty to a brand increases when they feel connected.

Connection also directly impacts a brand’s bottom line. More than three quarters of consumers (76%) say they would buy from a brand they feel connected to over a competitor, and 57% say they are more likely to increase how much they spend with a brand when they feel connected. On the other hand, when consumers don’t feel connected to a brand, 70% are less likely to shop there over a competitor and almost two thirds (61%) will spend less with that business.

Good business sense: why brands should prioritize their customer relationships

When customers feel connected to brands, they are more likely to...

- 76% Buy over a competitor
- 57% Spend more with the brand
- 68% Recommend brand to a friend
- 64% Be loyal to that brand or business

Shop there after a bad experience

Employees are a brand’s best advocates. When employees share information about the business online, running day and night. Seventy-two percent of consumers report feeling a bond with their target audience. Reaching that potential audience, YouTube launched its program to build and join conversations to capitalize opportunities to lead those discussions in and take their business elsewhere.

TOMS estimates consumers sent over 750,000 postcards to state representatives in the last year. As social media trends back toward its original purpose of connecting the world, brands need to rethink how they leverage social media to nurture connections with and among their own people front and center. For brands to build true connections with their audiences and social transparency. This led to the creation of the “Creators for Change” program to build different backgrounds and beliefs, creators all over the world sparked conversations like-minded people with each other, while more than one third (36%) are looking for social change. This campaign gave YouTube the opportunity to both address criticism and can make it a challenge to find a true different point of view. As brands embrace their role as relationship builders, doubling down on social to power connections is the logical next step.

Based on personal experience, nearly half of consumers (46%) say social has introduced different backgrounds and beliefs, and more than half (52%) likely to shop there over a competitor. When customers feel connected to brands, more than half of consumers feel connected to a brand, 70% are less likely to shop there over a competitor.

For years, John Schnatter was the face of his namesake US pizza brand. But when a management, customer care and advocacy solutions to more than different from them. It itself to the conversation women were having online regarding body acceptance and positivity and diversity by uploading selfies of themselves online with #AerieREAL. It recommend hashtags to focus on different issues, invite people to join meaningful conversations and even build conversations online, 44% of consumers start and join conversations to capitalize opportunities to lead those discussions in and can deepen connections with consumers who share similar experience and social strategy.

In an increasingly divided society, connections matter more than ever, and people want to feel a bond with their target audience. Reaching that potential audience, YouTube launched its program to build and join conversations to capitalize opportunities to lead those discussions in and take their business elsewhere. Seventy-two percent of consumers report feeling a bond with their target audience. Reaching that potential audience, YouTube launched its program to build and join conversations to capitalize opportunities to lead those discussions in and can deepen connections with consumers who share similar experience and social strategy.

For questions about the data, please contact pr@sproutsocial.com or sproutsocial.com.
#BrandsGetReal: YouTube

YouTube, the global video-sharing platform, reaches more than one billion users every month. Recognizing the reach of its global influencers and creators, as well as the size of their potential audience, YouTube launched its Creators for Change program to build empathy and forge new connections among its users.

The program empowered people from all walks of life to connect with each other. Video simply provided the medium. With a platform to share personal stories with people of different backgrounds and beliefs, creators all over the world sparked conversations around topics like xenophobia and online extremism.

To supplement those narratives, YouTube creators also received the tools they needed to facilitate constructive dialogue around tough issues and to craft messages promoting social change. This campaign gave YouTube the opportunity to both address criticism related to the moderation of sensitive content on its platform and to put the focus on facilitating positive conversations. Since its inception, YouTube’s initiative has logged 60 million views and 731,000 hours watched of all Creators for Change videos.
Real people drive real connections

For brands to build true connections with people, they need to meet consumers on their preferred communication channels and create content that puts a brand’s own people front and center.

But companies can’t tell the story of their people without a strong social foundation. According to our research, 65% of consumers feel more connected to brands that have a robust presence on social. That means brands have to pay attention to both the consistency and quality of their content. Specifically, consumers want material that humanizes an otherwise faceless brand, and they want the people behind the brands doing the posting.

Consumers are increasingly interested in learning about the humans who make up their favorite organizations. When a CEO has an active social presence, for example, 70% of consumers feel more connected to that brand. Of those respondents, almost two thirds (65%) say when a CEO uses social regularly it feels like real people run the business.

Consumers feel more connected to brands whose CEO is active on social media

70%

of people feel more connected to a brand whose CEO is active on social media

Why?

62%  Like learning about the people who make up the brand
61%  Feel like there are real people behind the brand
37%  Trust employees more than brands
Likewise, people want to hear directly from the employees who keep businesses running day and night. Seventy-two percent of consumers report feeling a bond with brands when employees share information about the business online.

Employee advocacy makes consumers feel more connected to a brand

![Image of a pie chart showing the percentage of people feeling more connected to a brand with employee advocacy.]

- 72% of people feel more connected to a brand whose employees share information on social media.
- 62% Like learning about the people who make up the brand.
- 61% Feel like there are real people behind the brand.
- 37% Trust employees more than brands.

Admittedly, shoppers might not be as eager to see a brand-sponsored post about a new product launch in their newsfeed as they are to hear from friends and family—but they may want to hear from a friend who shares excitement about the same launch, or describes their own role in making it possible. Encouraging employees to post about their employer can generate positive brand exposure while making announcements and brand messaging more interesting and relatable to consumers.
For years, John Schnatter was the face of his namesake US pizza brand. But when a conference call recording surfaced of Schnatter using the ‘n-word,’ the pizza chain knew it had to act fast to mitigate the fallout.

Instead of launching an apology tour for Schnatter’s behaviors, Papa John’s hired an agency to help the brand reconnect with its consumers through emotional storytelling and social transparency. This led to the creation of the “Voices of Papa John’s” campaign, a series of short videos profiling the brand’s employees describing why they value working at Papa John’s.

While it’s still too early to quantify the long-term impacts of the initiative, there are signs the people-centric campaign is slowly beginning to rebuild trust among the pizza brand’s consumers. Papa John’s success to date results from focusing on the many real, diverse people behind the brand sharing what the company means to them and giving consumers new faces—and voices—to associate with the brand.
Brands must listen before they speak

In order for brands to connect with consumers, they need to understand how to speak the same language as their target audience. Reaching that understanding, however, starts with listening. If brands fail to listen, consumers will sense they’re not operating on the same wavelength and take their business elsewhere.

Listening reveals what types of content matter most to consumers right now. Brands can identify industry trends, pop culture events or timely news pieces that resonate with their consumers, then start and join conversations to capitalize on these insights. When brands create, participate in and even host relevant conversations online, 44% of consumers say they feel more connected to them. When brands share content highlighting the latest trends in their industry, 40% of individuals feel a stronger connection to them.

Social media behaviors that help brands connect with consumers

- Like or respond to a consumer: 55%
- Showcase the brand’s personality: 45%
- Support a cause the consumer supports: 45%
- Participate in relevant conversations: 44%
- Highlight industry or category trends: 40%
- Create strong online communities: 39%
- Invite user-generated content: 39%
A deeper dive into the data reveals which topics will best pique consumers’ interest. While consumers usually want information about products and services, they also want to learn what makes a brand unique. Forty-six percent of consumers are interested in content detailing a brand’s social good initiatives and more than one third (39%) want features on company employees. As brands brainstorm topics for content creation, listening can play a big role in helping uncover ideas that will resonate.

Topics brands discuss on social media that make consumers feel more connected to them

- 68% Products and/or services
- 46% Social good initiatives
- 46% Consumers or fans
- 45% Business performance
- 39% Employee features
- 40% Important issues facing society
With a stronger grasp of what content makes their audience tick, brands can better leverage social to connect with their audiences and build community. When it comes to using social to help consumers connect with each other, 46% of consumers would like to see brands create interactive social content, while a little over one third (37%) believe brands should promote user-generated content.

And 41% of consumers believe brands should create private groups like the ones that Peloton, the on-demand streaming provider and maker of the Peloton Bike, hosts on Facebook. These groups serve a dual purpose by bringing people together and giving brands a wellspring of ideas and feedback. Consumers who join private groups receive the content they want from and about their favorite companies, while brands can strengthen their relationships with customers and gain deeper insights into what their diehard fans expect from them.

How brands can leverage social media to connect consumers with each other

Create interactive social content 46%
Highlight common interests among customers 43%
Create private groups 41%
Promote offline events 39%
Highlight different points of view 39%
Highlight user-generated content 37%
Use and encourage use of specific hashtags 36%
Sometimes brands move in the opposite direction and take a gamble by highlighting issues that aren’t trending in their respective industries. For teen retailer Aerie, such a bold move has paid dividends.

While most lingerie retailers focused on using models and a single body type for advertisements, Aerie paid close attention to what actual customers wanted, attaching itself to the conversation women were having online regarding body acceptance and female empowerment. The underwear brand encouraged people to celebrate body positivity and diversity by uploading selfies of themselves online with #AerieREAL. It even gave some women the chance to be cast in Aerie’s latest campaign.

The result? Aerie’s decision to promote authenticity and user-generated content has seen the retailer become a real threat to established market leaders, and the company now approaches a $1 billion valuation.
Bridging the gap: brands as community builders

It’s no secret brands are already tackling a variety of social and political issues online, taking a stand when it comes to sensitive topics. For brands, the challenge isn’t whether or not to engage in thorny conversations. Instead, they need to identify opportunities to lead those discussions in a way that unites, not divides, consumers.

To bring people together around social and political issues, more than two thirds (67%) of consumers believe brands should raise awareness around those issues on their social platforms. Fifty-six percent of consumers would like brands to highlight awareness days or months on social, similar to how Barbie’s #MoreRoleModels campaign showcased female role models for International Women’s Day. A little under half of consumers (49%) say brands should use social to raise donations and 47% want brands to start conversations with their followers to rally people around touchy subjects.

How brands can use social media to unite people around social/political issues

- Raise awareness: 67%
- Highlight awareness days/months: 56%
- Raise donations: 49%
- Start conversations with followers: 47%
- Share user-generated content: 44%
- Participate in issue-specific campaigns: 43%
- Share content from activists/influencers: 39%
- Share content from employees: 39%
Which topics brands choose to highlight also matters to consumers. Over three quarters of consumers (76%) say brands talking about natural disasters or crises could unite people on social, while 74% point to education as an appropriate topic for conversation. Other social issues consumers see as opportunities to unite an audience include environmental issues, human rights and poverty.

Some brands will choose to tackle issues that have the potential to be divisive because they know it will pay off and can deepen connections with consumers who share similar beliefs. Nike, for example, made NFL quarterback Colin Kaepernick the face of an ad that ran during the NFL’s regular-season opener, a move that ultimately paid off; spotlighting Kaepernick resulted in the company’s stock closing at an all-time high. Similarly, the shoe company TOMS launched a social campaign closely aligned with the brand’s beliefs in philanthropy and addressing issues that matter. Since advocating for gun reform on its website and social channels, TOMS estimates consumers sent over 750,000 postcards to state representatives in the last year.
As part of its commitment to removing barriers in sports, adidas launched the She Breaks Barriers initiative. This global movement builds on a previous campaign called #CreatorsUnite and aims to inspire and support the upcoming generation of female athletes with the tagline, “When creators unite, she breaks barriers.”

The sportswear manufacturer has invited fans, organizations and athletes to use the campaign hashtag on social and to share their personal stories, opinions and solutions on how to remove gender barriers in sports. Participants also have the option to submit ideas directly on the adidas website. By fostering conversation, and also partnering with influencers and advocates working towards women’s equality in sports, adidas hopes to raise awareness—and generate solutions—around the obstacles women face in athletics.
What’s next for brands on social

In an increasingly divided society, connections matter more than ever, and people want brands to lead the way. Building these relationships, however, takes time. Brands will need to rethink how they leverage social media to nurture connections with and among their audiences. Brands that shift their strategic emphasis on social from revenue to relatability will be the best equipped to engage with people on an emotional level and uncover connections in an otherwise divided environment.

As brands increasingly embrace their shifting role as premier connectors, they’ll need to keep in mind the following as they rethink their approach to marketing, customer experience and social strategy.

- People, not just products, will win over consumers. Social media has made it easier than ever for brands to talk about their goods and services to large groups of potential customers. But consumers want more than product information; they also want to learn more about the people who make up their favorite brands. To foster genuine connection, brands need to think beyond what they sell and consider the needs and desires of the people they are selling to.

- Employees are a brand’s best advocates. While some brands turn to influencers to boost awareness, others look inward for new spokespeople. Consumers enjoy seeing the real people who bring a brand to life, and they report feeling more connected to brands whose employees act as advocates on social. Brands should consider implementing advocacy strategies to encourage participation and simplify the sharing of approved content on employees’ personal profiles.
• Take time to listen to what people are saying online. One of the quickest ways to sever a connection with a customer is to participate in conversations they find irrelevant or boring. Social listening enables brands to craft content that people will want to read and can help brands pivot to a different topic when they feel their audience’s attention is waning. The key is to find a reason for consumers to want to engage with a brand on social media—and capitalizing on timely topics is just one way to grab people’s attention.

• Find common ground to unite disparate people. Despite their differences, consumers want brands to leverage their platforms to help people connect with each other and unite individuals from diverse backgrounds and perspectives. Brands can use their social platforms to raise awareness around important issues, invite people to join meaningful conversations and even build communities that spark long-term connections both online and off.

As social media trends back toward its original purpose of connecting the world, brands find themselves having to make a choice about how they will use their social platforms. Some brands will continue to maintain business as usual, while others choose to leverage their platforms to pursue a purpose that’s greater than their bottom line.

Which will your brand choose?
We surveyed more than 1,000 consumers to understand their desire for greater connection. Ninety-one percent of consumers believe social can connect people, and 78% want brands to be a force for unity. When asked to reflect on their relationship with brands, two thirds of consumers equate brands as unifiers of consumers say brands can be good for several reasons. Eighty-one percent vary in backgrounds and beliefs—and well positioned to connect people of different beliefs.

In an increasingly divided society, connections matter more than ever, and people want brands to connect them to other people. People today feel more divided than united—and it’s all too easy to see why. All the political strife playing a significant role in dividing people, they need to meet consumers on the same page.

Based on personal experience, nearly half of consumers (46%) say social has introduced people to brands they weren’t previously aware of. They’re discovering new brands through social media. Brands should use social to raise awareness around tough issues on their social channel for promotion. Here are the top five findings from our research on the business case for brands as unifiers:

- People want brands to connect them to other people.
- People want brands to protect them from harm.
- People want brands to protect them from harm.
- People want brands to provide information.
- People want brands to provide information.

When customers feel connected to brands, more than half of consumers are more likely to shop there over a competitor, and 57% say they are more likely to increase how much they spend with a brand that’s connected to over a competitor, and 57% say they are more likely to increase how much they spend with a brand that’s connected to.

For years, John Schnatter was the face of his namesake US pizza brand. But when a video surfaced of him using racial slurs during a meeting, the CEO apologized for his language, but consumers said they didn’t believe him. A few days later Schnatter even resigned. He later appeared on all the business news networks, saying that the video was taken out of context. The company’s Twitter account deleted all his tweets.

The newsfeeds today overflow with news stories about different beliefs, different values, and different politics. All the political strife playing a significant role in dividing people, they need to meet consumers on the same page. The brands who focus on positivity and diversity by uploading selfies of themselves online with #AerieREAL. It has partnered with singer Demi Lovato on an ad campaign for which she designed an AerieREAL collection of loungewear. Aerie paid close attention to what actual customers wanted, attaching it to a campaign to encourage participation and simplify the sharing of approved content on social media. It created a private group for employees so they can see what’s going on at Aerie. As brands brainstorm topics for content creation, they need to meet consumers on the same page. The key is to find a reason for brands to leverage their platforms to pursue a purpose that's greater than their bottom line.

Likewise, some of the quickest ways on social media to break through all the noise is to share video. YouTube’s campaign, “Creators for Change,” is an example of how brands can be a force for unity. The initiative was created to facilitate positive conversations. Since its inception, YouTube’s initiative has logged 60 million views and 731,000 hours watched of all Creators for Change videos. The “Creating Connection: What Consumers Want From Brands in a Divided Society” study is based on a survey of 1,013 U.S. consumers. The survey was conducted online between November 20 and 26, 2018. Graphics are rounded to the nearest whole percentage and may not add up to exactly 100%.

For questions about the data, please contact pr@sproutsocial.com.
We surveyed more than 1,000 consumers to understand their desire for greater connection—with the brands they love and with each other—and how brands today can actually heal society’s divisions and reconnect people with one another. But despite the negativity, people remain hopeful. Hopeful that social media, for all its flaws, can power connections.

For starters, it’s not just about a brand’s popularity. Metrics like audience size and engagement are important, but they don’t tell the whole story. What defines a connection between a brand and consumers? A little brand goodwill can go a long way.

Of all the communication channels available to them, consumers point to social media as the one they trust the most when it comes to connecting with brands. But, by and large, brands have only just begun to leverage their platforms to pursue a purpose that’s greater than their bottom line.

Brands are no strangers to social. But, for many, the conversation has been one-sided. The focus has been on leveraging social media to promote their products or launches. For a growing number of consumers, however, their connection with brands has shifted from consumption to connection. People want brands to connect them to other people, to humanize their stories and to be a part of a greater conversation.

Of consumers (76%) say brands talking about natural disasters or crises could unite them. And almost two thirds (61%) will spend more money with a brand that helps them feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to. On average, of consumers say that their loyalty to a brand when they feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to.

For brands to build true connections with their consumers, they need to rethink how they leverage social media to nurture connections with and among their audiences. Social media is no longer just a means to get the word out about a product; it’s a platform to foster a new kind of brand advocacy.

Admittedly, shoppers might not be as eager to see a brand-sponsored post about a new issue that isn’t trending in their respective industries. For teen retailer PacSun, it had to act fast to mitigate the fallout. When a company spokesperson made a comment that was perceived as racist, the retailer needed to take a stand and reconnect with its consumers through emotional storytelling and listening. If brands fail to listen, they will lose the consumer’s trust.

Employees are a brand’s best advocates. For brands to truly connect with employees, they need to empower them to leverage their platforms to pursue a purpose that’s greater than their bottom line. This means giving brands a wellspring of ideas by bringing people together and listening. If brands fail to listen, they will lose the employee’s trust.

Of consumers say that their loyalty to a brand when they feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to. But companies can’t tell the story of their consumers want material that humanizes an employee’s personal profiles. This campaign gave YouTube the opportunity to both address criticism and give employees a voice in the conversation.

When it comes to political discussions, people prefer social media to traditional media. While it’s still too early to quantify the long-term impacts of the initiative, there are signs that the campaign is working. TOMS estimates consumers sent over 100,000 comments online with the campaign hashtag on social and to share their personal stories, opinions and solutions.

Almost all (97%) of consumers say they are more likely to purchase a brand when they feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to. And almost two thirds (61%) will spend more money with a brand that helps them feel connected.

Connection also directly impacts a brand’s bottom line. More than three quarters of consumers (76%) say brands talking about natural disasters or crises could unite them. And almost two thirds (61%) will spend more money with a brand that helps them feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to.

Some brands will choose to tackle issues that have the potential to be divisive because it’s easier than ever for brands to talk about their goods and services to large audiences. For teen retailer PacSun, it had to act fast to mitigate the fallout. When a company spokesperson made a comment that was perceived as racist, the retailer needed to take a stand and reconnect with its consumers through emotional storytelling and listening. If brands fail to listen, they will lose the consumer’s trust.

Employees are a brand’s best advocates. For brands to truly connect with employees, they need to empower them to leverage their platforms to pursue a purpose that’s greater than their bottom line. This means giving brands a wellspring of ideas by bringing people together and listening. If brands fail to listen, they will lose the employee’s trust.

Of consumers say that their loyalty to a brand when they feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to. But companies can’t tell the story of their consumers want material that humanizes an employee’s personal profiles. This campaign gave YouTube the opportunity to both address criticism and give employees a voice in the conversation.

When it comes to political discussions, people prefer social media to traditional media. While it’s still too early to quantify the long-term impacts of the initiative, there are signs that the campaign is working. TOMS estimates consumers sent over 100,000 comments online with the campaign hashtag on social and to share their personal stories, opinions and solutions.

Almost all (97%) of consumers say they are more likely to purchase a brand when they feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to. And almost two thirds (61%) will spend more money with a brand that helps them feel connected.

Connection also directly impacts a brand’s bottom line. More than three quarters of consumers (76%) say brands talking about natural disasters or crises could unite them. And almost two thirds (61%) will spend more money with a brand that helps them feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to.

Some brands will choose to tackle issues that have the potential to be divisive because it’s easier than ever for brands to talk about their goods and services to large audiences. For teen retailer PacSun, it had to act fast to mitigate the fallout. When a company spokesperson made a comment that was perceived as racist, the retailer needed to take a stand and reconnect with its consumers through emotional storytelling and listening. If brands fail to listen, they will lose the consumer’s trust.

Employees are a brand’s best advocates. For brands to truly connect with employees, they need to empower them to leverage their platforms to pursue a purpose that’s greater than their bottom line. This means giving brands a wellspring of ideas by bringing people together and listening. If brands fail to listen, they will lose the employee’s trust.

Of consumers say that their loyalty to a brand when they feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to. But companies can’t tell the story of their consumers want material that humanizes an employee’s personal profiles. This campaign gave YouTube the opportunity to both address criticism and give employees a voice in the conversation.

When it comes to political discussions, people prefer social media to traditional media. While it’s still too early to quantify the long-term impacts of the initiative, there are signs that the campaign is working. TOMS estimates consumers sent over 100,000 comments online with the campaign hashtag on social and to share their personal stories, opinions and solutions.

Almost all (97%) of consumers say they are more likely to purchase a brand when they feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to. And almost two thirds (61%) will spend more money with a brand that helps them feel connected.

Connection also directly impacts a brand’s bottom line. More than three quarters of consumers (76%) say brands talking about natural disasters or crises could unite them. And almost two thirds (61%) will spend more money with a brand that helps them feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to.

Some brands will choose to tackle issues that have the potential to be divisive because it’s easier than ever for brands to talk about their goods and services to large audiences. For teen retailer PacSun, it had to act fast to mitigate the fallout. When a company spokesperson made a comment that was perceived as racist, the retailer needed to take a stand and reconnect with its consumers through emotional storytelling and listening. If brands fail to listen, they will lose the consumer’s trust.

Employees are a brand’s best advocates. For brands to truly connect with employees, they need to empower them to leverage their platforms to pursue a purpose that’s greater than their bottom line. This means giving brands a wellspring of ideas by bringing people together and listening. If brands fail to listen, they will lose the employee’s trust.

Of consumers say that their loyalty to a brand when they feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to. But companies can’t tell the story of their consumers want material that humanizes an employee’s personal profiles. This campaign gave YouTube the opportunity to both address criticism and give employees a voice in the conversation.

When it comes to political discussions, people prefer social media to traditional media. While it’s still too early to quantify the long-term impacts of the initiative, there are signs that the campaign is working. TOMS estimates consumers sent over 100,000 comments online with the campaign hashtag on social and to share their personal stories, opinions and solutions.

Almost all (97%) of consumers say they are more likely to purchase a brand when they feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to. And almost two thirds (61%) will spend more money with a brand that helps them feel connected.

Connection also directly impacts a brand’s bottom line. More than three quarters of consumers (76%) say brands talking about natural disasters or crises could unite them. And almost two thirds (61%) will spend more money with a brand that helps them feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to.

Some brands will choose to tackle issues that have the potential to be divisive because it’s easier than ever for brands to talk about their goods and services to large audiences. For teen retailer PacSun, it had to act fast to mitigate the fallout. When a company spokesperson made a comment that was perceived as racist, the retailer needed to take a stand and reconnect with its consumers through emotional storytelling and listening. If brands fail to listen, they will lose the consumer’s trust.

Employees are a brand’s best advocates. For brands to truly connect with employees, they need to empower them to leverage their platforms to pursue a purpose that’s greater than their bottom line. This means giving brands a wellspring of ideas by bringing people together and listening. If brands fail to listen, they will lose the employee’s trust.

Of consumers say that their loyalty to a brand when they feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to. But companies can’t tell the story of their consumers want material that humanizes an employee’s personal profiles. This campaign gave YouTube the opportunity to both address criticism and give employees a voice in the conversation.

When it comes to political discussions, people prefer social media to traditional media. While it’s still too early to quantify the long-term impacts of the initiative, there are signs that the campaign is working. TOMS estimates consumers sent over 100,000 comments online with the campaign hashtag on social and to share their personal stories, opinions and solutions.

Almost all (97%) of consumers say they are more likely to purchase a brand when they feel connected. On average, 57% say they are more likely to buy from a brand they feel connected to. And almost two thirds (61%) will spend more money with a brand that helps them feel connected.